Timber Supply.

TREMENDOUS INCREASE IN CONSUMPTION OF LATE YEARS.

Methods of Cutting Such That Exhaustion is Within Measurable Distance.

The savants of all nations have been foretelling for years the approaching extinction of the world's forest reserves, with one or two exceptions, little apparent effect has been produced on the policy of government respecting afforestation.

There may now be said to be only six countries in a position to supply unlimited quantities of merchantable timber, namely Korea (including Finland), Austria-Hungary, Norway and Sweden, in Europe, and Canada and the United States in America.

Of these the reserves in the United States, Russia proper and Austria-Hungary are now seriously threatened by the rapid growth of their own requirements consequent on the natural increase of the population, while in Norway the reaping of the timber crop has been so wasteful as to bring exhaustion within measurable distance. The resources of Finland are still large as are also those of Sweden, while Canada now represents the world's great reserve.

As already indicated, the European countries with a large surplus available for export are Austria-Hungary (with which may be coupled Bosnia and Herzegovina), Russia (including Finland), Sweden and Norway. From all of these countries, with the exception of Austria-Hungary, Great Britain imports largely of timber for constructional purposes, and our interest in the depletion of their forest reserves is no mere academic one.

By far and away the largest forest reserve in Europe is in Russia and Finland, which have between them over 500,000,000 acres under timber. Austria-Hungary comes next, but a long way behind, with 50,000,000 acres. Sweden follows with 45,000,000 acres, Germany with 34,000,000 acres, France with 23,000,000 acres, Spain with 20,000,000 acres, Norway with 17,000,000 acres, and Italy and Bulgaria each with 10,000,000 acres.

The eyes of the world are now directed to North America in their search for future timber supplies. The area of land under forest in the United States is prodigious. The total amounts roughly to 700,000 acres, of which nearly 150,000,000 acres are under state management or control.

Estimates naturally vary widely as to the actual reserves of merchantable timber, the government census of 1900 putting the stand at 1,300,000,000 feet board measure, while two years later Dr. R. E. Fernow, of Toronto, Canada, estimated it at 2,300,000,000 feet.

This latter figure was substantially corroborated by the American Lumbermen in 1905, but a conservative estimate by a well-informed correspondent, which appeared in the Times at the close of 1908, put it at 1,500,000,000 feet.

Though it is almost impossible for the lay mind to realize what these figures mean, attempts have been made to place a value on the timber, the figure which is generally accepted by competent authorities being roughly 24,000,000,000 sterling.

The present lumber cut amounts to 38,000,000 feet and is increasing at a truly remarkable pace. The rapid growth of population would, of course, prepare one for an increase in the timber consumption year by year, but the actual rate of increase has not been very much in excess of what might reasonably be looked for on that basis.

Between 1880 and 1900 the growth of the population amounted to 52 per cent, but in the same period the output of domestic timber increased by 94 per cent. The output in the first-mentioned year was 1,000,000,000 board feet, and since that date the quantity put through the mills of the United States totals 800,000,000,000 feet.

The exports to Europe amount to between eight and nine million pounds sterling per annum, but on the other hand over 80 per cent of the timber exports from Canada go to the United States.

From these figures it follows that without taking into account the growth of new forests the available supply of merchantable timber would be exhausted in forty years, and even taking such growth into consideration sixty years would appear to be the furthest limit of the duration of the timber supplies.

Happily, there are indications that the public conscience is being awakened to the obligation which rests upon the community to make good as far as possible the enormous annual wastage, and not only are the forests being to some extent conserved, but efforts are being made to reduce the abominable waste, which even yet is estimated but little short of a quantity equivalent to that actually utilized.

Under the best conditions, however, it is becoming interestingly plain that the time when the United States will have timber to spare for foreign countries is fast drawing to a close.

Overwhelming Castigation.

To the Editor of the Times.

Dear Sir:—Under the caption of "Jauriñien in Limón," which appeared in our issue of the 5th, your readers were treated to a splendid literature and a fine display of common-sense knowledge; while Señor Marcus Aureliis Garvey came in for a sound castigation. It is to be hoped that this salutary whipping has cured him of his infamy.

Exco has extended his arm. Every stroke of his pen has dashed Garvey into atoms. Marcus Aureliis has been weighed in the balances and found wanting. The electric light of superior intelligence has been turned on his rath and assinine statements, exposing them as morbid rubbish. Who shall blame this conduct?

And now Meribald Garvey, if thou say'st that, did send your master I tell thee Marcus, thou hast lied!

The searchlights from our battlements have been turned on you. You are now seen at your best and real self; yet, in very bad condition, a pitiable and unenviable rubbish-bag; incapable of sending out anything but a howling stink. Stop pervading our pure journalistic atmosphere with the obnoxious effluvia emanating from your only treasure,—a diseased mind.

You have tempted the mercurial cook to cry, Se, Calidillo Garvey! Yours in counsel, Gallo del Monte.

The Man in the Woods.

To the Editor of the Times.

Sir:—Please allow me space in your columns to reply to an advertisement in your paper of this morning's issue under the heading "The Man About Town."

Now Mr. Editor, "The Man About Town" make reference to the youth at St. Mark's as playing Rector, and that he has not got that Curacy yet, but let me inform "The Man About Town" that that youth was the only old brick that fitted the broken walls of St. Mark's and he has now stopped what might have rendered the Church of Christ closed to public worship. May I ask "The Man About Town" why did he not fit himself for the position if he now covets the youth? I should like "The Man About Town" to tackle that youth personally, when I am sure his persuasive and intelligent would not elevate to form the centre of his gravitation and if he is not sufficient for him owing to his position I beg to refer him to The Man in the Woods.

I am, etc.,

A Vagrant.

EMMA MIXED UP.

A respectable-looking black man was brought up to the Police Court yesterday charged with vagrancy on Monday night last. From the evidence of the police it appeared that when the Inspector of Police was making his nightly rounds he saw this man sitting on the bench "residing" (Emma) behind one of the north-east railway barriers, in a questionable position. Emma was taken up and carried to the court, and was yesterday arraigned on the above charge.

The man said in defence, that he was walking on the railway track and Emma, in her usual manner said to him: "Give me five cents!" He opened his purse and gave her 25 cents. She left him and went behind the cars, and he followed her to see what she was doing there, when he was pounced upon by the Inspector of Police who gave him in charge of a police. The judge was not inclined to believe his version of the affair and pronounced him guilty and imposed a fine of $10 or the alternative of 60 days in the college (county). The fine was afterwards reduced to $25.

We always understood that a supplied choir of the Anglican Churches were only called out to attend the funeral of their brothers or sisters who filled a similar place, or the funeral of some church dignity. We were however undeceived in this respect on Sunday evening at the funeral of a lady who it appears was not even an active member of the church. Is this a new order, or was it done for show?

We learn with pleasure that Mr. Louis Davidson, son of our esteemed friend Mr. S. Davidson, will be the manager of the stock-in-trade lately carried on by Mr. Jose Barbeau. Mr. Davidson will carry on in addition to the stock of ladies and gentlemen's boots and shoes, an entire stock of ironmongery. His well known knowledge of this class of goods is a sufficient guarantee of the completeness of the business he means to offer to a long-suffering people, who have been under the pressure of high priced goods for a long period. The Times wishes the new firm of Louis Davidson and Co., every success.
